named Richard Atkinson, who lives in the hotel upstairs, and three men, for whom the police are looking to-day. "Just before clesing up," said Atkinson to-day, "McMahon went out the side door. One of the men in the room followed him in a couple of minutes. Then the others went out. I went upstairs and to bed. McMahon's house is only a few steps from the side door, but he would not have had time to reach it before the man who followed him out got to the street. I don't know whether McMahon started for his house or whether he went up Eighth avenue."

Certainly McMahon did not go to his house, and what he did between o'clock and the time he was pounded near the flat-house is a mystery. The neighborhood is lonely after midnight.

J. Bernard, who has a drug store at No. 2899 Eighth avenue, between One Hundred and Fifty-third and One Hundred and Fifty-fourth streets, was awakened about 4 o'clack by the noise of scuming and cursing in the street in front of the store. He got up and looked out of the window, but could to t see anything. At about this hour persons on the ground floor of the flat-house, a block away, heard the assailants of McMahon pounding and kicking him, but no one investigated.

BLOOD SCATTERED ALL OVER.

It is no exaggeration to say that McMahon's blood was scattered all over the neighborhood when Evening World reporters began to investigate the crime at daylight. There were bloodstains on the sidewalk on the west. And Tired, Fretted over the neighborhood when Evening World reporters began to investigate side of Eighth avenue from One Hundred and Fifty-fourth street to One Hundred and Fifty-third street, diagonally across the pavement to the southeast corner of One Hundred and Fifty-third street and Eighth avenue and eastward in One Hundred and Fifty-third street to the flat-house entrance The door and vestibule were spattered with blood.

The murderers must have waded in this blood. Leading away from the stoop footprints could be traced for twenty feet. They were small and pointing toward Eighth avenue. From all of these bloodstains two theories were evolved &

The first is that McMahon was assaulted near or at the corner of One Hundred and Fifty-fourth street and Eighth avenue, and dragged or led When All Other Remedies are to his home, where the murder was completed. The other is that he was waylaid at the door, put up a stiff fight and injured one of his assailants to that he bled as he ran away up Eighth avenue.
